People, planet, profit: none can survive without the others and the world has come to understand this holistic view of sustainability.

A 2012 survey of more than 3,000 executives by the MIT Sloan Management Review found that more than 70 percent of companies have made sustainability a permanent addition to their management agendas. A subsequent survey in 2013 by the same group reports that more than 60 percent of companies who added sustainability to the management agenda saw an increase in profit.

Investors also see a strong link between corporate sustainability performance and financial performance and it's creating a bigger demand for better data, better management, better cities — and better business models.

When business gets it, that's good. But it will take a cross-disciplinary "coming together" for survival. Businesses are dependent on a healthy operational society — and they're definitely dependent on a healthy operational environment.

It's really about how we are going to thrive as a society and what our economic systems are going to look like. But figuring out what sustainability actually means and how to enact change can be a very controversial topic. There are many differing options on what to focus on and when.

We want a safe and secure world for our children and the generations to come. And we must have the courage to make changes to preserve the stability and safety of our local communities at home and throughout the planet.

With dynamic content and networking at the intersection of money and meaning, our members from local business, government, education, utilities, property owners, and community stakeholders, can work together to benchmark, develop and implement creative strategies for measuring progress. Progress toward goals established by industry's enlightened self-interest that is guided by science based decision making, and participatory governing through civic engagement, we can create a world of climate wealth.

Sustainable San Antonio's Purpose

To be a nexus of organizations and people to disseminate sustainable development technology through practice and education with participating parties to explore, explain and demonstrate:

- What is sustainability?
- Why does it matter, is important or should we care?
- How can we all benefit, profit and prosper?

As a Membership Organization We:

- Collaborate with businesses, governments, academia, organizations and individuals who are dedicated to environmental stewardship and socioeconomic proficiency in order to advocate and champion a sustainable form of economic development to opinion leaders throughout these sectors, our local community and beyond.
- Provide a platform to connect and mobilize thousands of people in an effort to spark the formation of business and personal relationships between local community groups and throughout the world.
- Create programs that use environmental action and education as a launching point for civic engagement with the end goal of an overall healthier, more prosperous and vibrant community by advocating for a more profitable and sustainable livelihood.
- Are a community resource for sustainable development technologies and practices throughout the San Antonio Metro Area and internationally where subject matter experts and thought leaders come together to exchange ideas and share resources.

"The days of a false choice between environmental protection and economic growth are over."
